Broadband must be reclassified as a public utility because it has become essential to functioning efficiently today. Telecommunication Industries have flourished under the Net Neutrality rules that were in place before the Verizon Vs FCC decision came down, and no company has given a concrete example of how those restrictions harm their business.

Providing fast-lane access to individuals, whether through mobile or non-mobile broadband, is discrimination that cannot be tolerated because it increases what those in poverty or near-poverty cannot obtain, while disrupting efficient living.
