

7521131792.txt

Internet service providers should not have the reigns to control the speed of specific content. Allowing a pay-to-play fast lane puts any startup at a disadvantage, thereby reducing competition and stifling innovation. Disguising this measure as a means to protect consumers is erroneous at best. Measures can be put in place separately to insure that customers get the speed they're paying for while maintaining an even playing field.