

7521132823.txt

We must not allow media giants, corporations, communications companies (or even someone in their parents' basement for that matter) to have control over what content becomes easily accessed to the End User.

The whole revolutionary point of the internet is to allow everyone access to any legal type of information. It is an extremely powerful tool that allows even third world countries to have the knowledge base of our powerful America. To give the internet an arbitrary imbalance would be a massive detriment to the most important learning tool since the printed page.

With the advent of hyper-speed technology like Google Fiber, as well as our internationally slow speeds -- as of 2013 we were ranked 9th in the world. Ninth! -- it is clear that tech companies are trying to retain their control on the consumer rather than innovate. The internet must remain neutral.