As a network and systems engineer who has worked for the likes of Earthlink, Global Crossing, and Limelight Networks all of whom are Internet Service Providers of one type or another, I can assure you this proposal to allow for an "internet fastlane" is poorly thought out. The FACT here is that internet services are a public utility. More so today than phone or television services. The idea that it would not be regulated as such is a disgrace and is an example of how corruption has likely reached to the highest levels of the FCC.
