

7521135053.txt

I, Wesley Cowan, being of sound mind and body, do state here that any regulations that restrict access to the Internet, in any form, is the same as crippling a nation's Freedom of Speech.

On the Internet, a person can find anything that they desire. That same person can find those things elsewhere, if they have the time and are willing to spend the effort to search. When someone is determined, as most United States citizens are, they will stop at nothing to reach the result they desire. Currently, the citizens desire an end to the regulating of the Internet.

Since when had it been the job of the United States to police other countries? As far as I am concerned, each country is sovereign, meaning no nation can command another. Regulation placed on the Internet