

7521137244.txt

ISPs exist in a market with a huge barrier of entry. Not only that but they also use networking technologies most people don't have the time or resources to fully understand. Those are two of the most important concepts for a free free market and ISPs have taken advantage of consumers in their absence. Allowing ISPs to create "Fast Lanes" would be disastrous for consumers, with the only restrictions being the nebulous concept of "commercially reasonable". These rules need to be scrapped and replaced with rules that don't pander to ISPs and ensure true Net Neutrality.