True Net Neutrality must be protected. By giving ISPs the power to charge extra for a "fast lane" they will also be giving power to large corporations to snuff out small business competitors. By increasing the speed at which their site is being received by end-users, they will HAVE to reduce the speed of other services, that's how the internet works. It cannot be done any other way without building new infrastructure, ISPs have made it obvious that this is not their plan.

I am urging the FCC and Tom Wheeler in particular to throw out the proposal to allow internet providers to charge for preferential treatment. Preferential treatment is NOT protecting an open internet in any way. If we are to truly protect the open internet the FCC must go back to its original plan and classify all ISPs as telecommunications services. This is the only way to truly restore Net Neutrality.
