

The internet exists as a pooling of resources and ideas, and there is no other medium in the world that can match its power of innovation and invention. Human progress is now dependent on the internet and the ability to freely and quickly share information. Everyone from individual users to large corporations depend on the internet. Current legislation is a threat to the incredible powerful service. With greater restrictions on who has the right to send information quickly across the internet and who has fast access to which resources, innovation will be stifled and large corporations will grow even larger. Their influence is already overwhelming, as can be seen through American politics and legislation. Do not let them grow stronger. The internet is built and sustained by the public, and depriving them of that power would dampen the peoples' creativity and hurt society in many different ways.