

7521140810.txt

I oppose any measure that further consolidates what has already become an oligopoly of telecommunications providers. A free, open, and neutral internet requires competition. A merger of Comcast and Time Warner would cause inevitable and irreparable harm to consumers. Further, this damage would be borne by the consumer in exchange for no additional benefit. Further attenuating already-scarce competitive pressures will remove incentives for innovation and lead to technological stagnation. America's internet quality and speeds are already behind most other first-world countries. Giving commercial advantages to some of the largest and most profitable telecommunication companies will inflate this gap, not close it. Instead, I support competition and regulating all ISPs as common carriers.