

Dear FCC,

I'm sure maintaining the World Wide Web is a very difficult thing to do, and all that, but there is one thing you should not be doing at all, in any way shape or form. And that's changing the net neutrality rules, so that big corporations, such as Google, and snuff out smaller websites that can't compete with their recourses. In essence, you should stop catering to the beck and call of the big corporations, and instead maintain the Net Neutrality as it is now. As it is called the World Wide Web, it should be open to everyone, rather than just those that can afford to pay the big greedy corporations to just have access to the internet.

Sincerely, Michael Canfield.
