

To those it may concern:

Net Neutrality is essential to the running of the internet, and allowing ISPs to charge premiums for certain websites on top of the already exorbitant cost of internet use and, in the case of websites and services that charge a premium of their own, on top of that, would not only be tantamount to mugging the users, it would very likely take away from the profits of such websites. That services such as Netflix, and Google, and Amazon, and eBay, and Gamefly, and the video game companies that users of such would have to pay extra on top of their internet and online gaming premiums are against this speaks for itself. That over twenty thousand people have made filings speaking out against this in the past thirty days alone speaks for itself. If there is an ounce of business sense in your collective bodies, if you care at all about the people you profess to be doing this for, you must NOT do this.
