

7521149584.txt

I support the idea of Net Neutrality. I believe that allowing the creation of paid "fast lanes" in the internet inherently makes everything else a slow lane and creates the potential for a situation in which people have to pay extra money to the big carriers in order to make their voice heard or to remain or become competitive. Despite the assurances of Mr. Wheeler that the FCC would not allow degrading of service or other acts that are against competition I do not believe that such a process could reasonably be implemented. At the very best it would leave users at the mercy of an extra layer of beurocracy that the biggest and best established companies are more capable of navigating or manipulating than the small companies and individuals. I see nothing in these new proposed systems that could possibly be a benefit for the vast majority of users, and many things that could be misused to our detriment. Please do not let the internet become a pay-for-play arena.