

7521149963.txt

I am strongly opposed to this ruling. It's a complete lie and sham to claim it protects net neutrality.

This is nothing more than an FCC commissioner's attempt to work for the big cable companies instead of the people. There should be no fast lanes. I already pay my internet service provider for access to the internet. Asking someone on the other end of the connection to pay for it would be like the post office charging me to mail a letter, and then charging the person receiving the letter an additional fee.

This is nothing more than catering to the ISP's greed, which has already resulted in the US ranking in the bottom of price and speed when it comes to internet connections. Not to mention certain companies ranking at the bottom for customer satisfaction as well.

Keep the internet the way it is. It work. Don't let greed ruin something that already works.

Ian Lipsky