

7521153133.txt

I may not be very versed on the law and how it applies in it's present state, but I would just to have my say about why the neutrality of the internet matters. It matters to me because the internet is the last low-cost market available to every day people who are considering new ways to make a living. In a situation where major corporation can filter every user directly to what they would like to sell, all of these low-level "mom and pop" style ventures will have no way to be found and will invariably flounder.

Any argument against net neutrality is essentially an argument toward monopolizing the internet in the same way television is currently being controlled solely by mega-corporations.

Everything individual and interesting about the internet will quickly be burried under mass-market whitewash and doomed to be nearly inaccessible by any user.

When you turn on your television you see empty reality shows, news channels that sensationalize everything they report, bland sitcoms with laugh-tracks, sports, and endless commercials every 3 minutes. Just look at discovery channel, and the history channel. They used to show informational, intelligent programming and the mass market has pushed them into making shows about hunting bigfoot, and selling old furniture in order for them to stay alive.

The internet has the power to be so much more than this if is allowed to flourish. It's openness to everyone is it's absolute greatest strength as a medium and if that is taken away it would simply waste away into unintelligent garbage under the control of controlled by media giants.

Everyone hates to see small local businesses being put out of work by a new wal-mart moving into town. If massive communication corporations get to have free reign over who has access to the internet, that exact thing will happen to all the individuality of the internet. It will slam a door shut in the face of anyone who wants to build something and share it with others. And it will lock new businesses and individuals from making something of themselves.

The internet is the present and the future of global communication and no corporation should have the power to bend it as they please. Thank you for your time.