

It is unfortunate in this period of unparalleled innovation that the Federal Government seeks to allow special interests to gain the largest unfair advantage possible by allowing internet service providers to create a tiered system. This separation will influence the balance of power in a negative way, limit public access to an open and free marketplace and forever irreparably damage the greater good.

The World Wide Web is a communications and commerce vehicle which is relied upon for a great deal of education, trade, communications, innovation and free speech in our everyday lives; furthermore, trillions of dollars flow through this portal, driving economies all over the world. It is unparalleled in history, in the impact it has had on the world and on our lives.

What place does the FCC have on limiting our access to this system by this change?

How does this change benefit the greater good? How does this change enhance the public welfare? How does this support our principals of a free and open society where all people are equal? It doesn't. It benefits special interests. It does this by allowing the interests of entities who can most afford the "privileged lanes" a genuine class distinction. This is a thinly veiled step toward limiting of freedoms and is being deliberately created by you, our government. Our government who work for and are paid for by We The People.

The FCC works in the public interest and exists only to make communications safe and fair, in a nation which was founded upon like principals.

The Government's overarching opinion as of late is that: they make the rules, you don't, We The People make the rules and Government is there to serve our interests. This proposal does nothing to serve the public, our interests, or our better welfare.
