

7521153571.txt

I am writing for your consideration on the rules status of Proceeding Number 14-28, "Protecting and Promoting the Open Internet". My initial concerns for these rules that favor possible throttling of bandwidth based on content access puts too much control into the ISP's hands, and not enough in the consumer.

I feel that the Internet should be a neutral even ground for ideas, education and freedom to share. If corporations had the ability to throttle bandwidth to customers for a price, what would prevent them from controlling content and only displaying what they wish us as consumers to access.

I feel these initial rules are ultimately to discourage piracy... a trait I find commendable. However, I feel that the rules in question are similar to SOPA and CISPA. Too general and far-reaching to discourage piracy, and ultimately giving control of ideas to the highest bidders instead. This negates the ability to be innovative for those who cannot afford to buy into the system. I beg you all to consider these rules carefully, and please act for the protection and interest of the American people in your decisions regarding Net Neutrality.