The internet, especially broadband internet, is as vital to our economic success and political and social prosperity as was the printing press to the founders. Perhaps more so. We need only look to the recent upheavals regarding wire tapping and electronic surveillance to connect how modern citizens feel about their electronic communications to how their forebears regarded their papers and effects. I do not envy the task of the Commission in addressing the issue at hand; a successful policy will necessarily take as radical and unpopular a direction as any previously necessary departure from broken and outmoded norms. Good luck.
