Please keep Net Neutrality rules to favor consumers instead of Internet Service Providers. ISP's such as AT&T, Verizon, Comcast, and Time Warner have been using their status as a Tier II utility to build out their phone, cable, and internet backbones, yet they don't want their internet or TV services governed by Tier II rules. In all of these companies, their triple play of TV, Phone, and Internet services are delivered by the same cable or fiber and as such I believe they should be ruled as Tier II Utilities since they share the same facilities to deliver all of their services, and use Tier II grants, loans, and other government subsidies to build their networks. So why aren't they considered Tier II Utilities? If they are going to continue using Tier II subsidies for their network backbones, they should be under all Tier II rules and regulation.
