I seriously can not believe the sudden turn around of the FCC on Neutrality Rules after fighting so long for a few years I remember the FCC being for a free and open internet at one time around 2005 to 2010...

Now all the sudden you at basic level want let large corporations control a service that started out as a tool run by the USA gov. Talk about giving up easy... Was it money from isps/politicians that made the FCC change it's mind?

is mcdonalds going to run the highway system next then start force everybody into their drive through windows? And anybody who does not buy mcdonalds at the drive through windows gets throttled down in how fast they can drive? (and all this happens while paying mcdonalds a fee to get on the roads at all?)

Ohh then mcdonalds and they cut off all roads to small "mom and pop" fast food chains and their rivals burger king and wendys?

Nice job FCC if this type of thing even comes close passing. Screw up the economy even more than it is by making the few isps out there even bigger and choking out everything they dont want to happen. The internet is what drives tons of the money going around these days.

There is only a limited number of isp providers in some areas as it is most do not get choice then if the isp decides they do not like a service and want you to use only theirs they can do that unless the internet is 100% open and free traffic. (or they can make it so slow it is almost impossible to use)

People Only have comcast as a high speed isp where they are? Well too bad if they decide they do not want you to go to a video webservice one day because they want you to use only their video service. ETC ETC

The large ISPs do not need to run anything it should not be in their control it grew fine on it's own the way it since it started, the internet and it's access rules should be curated by neutral non profit organization only.
