We cannot allow corporate America to limit or do as they see fit. What if during election periods these entities restrict, and sell their bandwidth to the highest bidder, i.e. a political party, to keep others from researching topics, or politicians and restrict the public from having an educated vote? That would be unconstitutional. Our forefathers gave us inalienable rights:

Freedom to express yourself.
Freedom to worship as you wish.
Right to a prompt, fair trial by jury.
Right to vote in elections for public officials.
Right to apply for federal employment requiring U.S. citizenship.
Right to run for elected office.
Freedom to pursue life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

As you can see, if these corporations get privy to allow or deny access to quality internet for ALL in the U.S.A. We then lose our rights given to us from birth. We will not have the right to express ourselves, due to the restricted or absence of internet at any given time for any length of time. If it becomes allowable to purchase allotments of bandwidth access to certain types of usage, it could be used to restrict the freedom of speech, and education to the public.

With the rules of supply & demand, what happens to the towns where the population is small, and it's difficult to provide service? Can the companies then decide to discontinue service due to costs, or just give them bare minimum connections? How would this be equal access to the internet?

Further more, it also restricts the many people's right to 'Life, Liberty, and pursuit of happiness.' To all the military families whom only get to see their loved ones via SKYPE while they are over seas. To the parent's working 2 jobs trying to get by, who use conferencing systems to keep in communication with their children. Or how about those who use the internet as a source of education, as such, online universities or online classes?

Such bandwidth restrictions or monetary surcharges/fees would keep students, families, and the general public from accessing such sources. I ask you, to please take these things into consideration.

I know I would not want to live in a world where a select few CEO's of AT&T, Time Warner Cable, Verizon and Comcast get to decide what I can and cannot do. When does it stop, and where do we draw the line, only to erase it and draw it closer to the proverbial wall that which we are all lined up along?

Thank you for your time.

Warm regards,

Jared Neil
