

7521161402.txt

I am in full opposition of any FCC decision that would, in any way, allow for telecommunications companies to create "fast lane access" at premium costs. Whether the decision is overt or tacit (i.e., you create exploitable loopholes), the only thing I support is a free and open internet through classifying ISPs as Title II common carriers.

I am sure you've heard any number of arguments based on the freedom of the individual, but let me offer a different perspective. In the event that companies can establish premium access to content, the true loser is public education. By allowing telecommunications companies to regulate access to content, you are effectively widening the socioeconomic divide between the "haves" and the "have nots" in this country. People need free access to information in order to improve themselves; when you put that access behind a paywall, you are removing one of the few avenues that the American poor have to break the cycle of poverty.

Please, don't vote in line with corporate lobbyists. Protect what is quickly becoming a basic, utilitarian need by classifying ISPs as common carriers. Your children, your grandchildren, and those of us struggling to better ourselves will all thank you.