

7521163164.txt

I support net neutrality. The act of creating "fast and faster lanes" of service will no doubt enable internet websites that are now at the top of the food chain to have an unfair advantage over new internet businesses.

Also, there is something unsavory about the cable companies that want to profit from offering this service when such technical innovations should benefit everyone. If the service is an improvement over competitors, then the profit from increased business should cover the cost of the technology. If the cable companies refuse to compete, then they are not adhering the tenets of capitalism and should fail.