At the behest of John Oliver, I have navigated your absurdly (and probably intentionally) unwieldy website to share my comments on your concept of "net neutrality". I was a kid when the internet hit its hay-day, and I have grown up seeing companies come and go, grow and thrive, crash and burn. Many of these companies were started by individuals - individuals with their own version of the American dream in mind. By enabling Comcast and Verizon to charge different amounts for different speeds, not only are you granting those ISPs even more reign over the modern marvel of information exchange, but you are further bogging down those individuals who have that dream in their head (whatever that dream may be). People who want to start their own business are instantly at a disadvantage based on all of the bureaucracy they have to go through just to register their name. They basically have to have a lawyer on-hand to get through all of the regulation and red tape. If they manage to get through this phase, which is expensive, time consuming, and stressful enough as it is, now these self-starters are put at an even further disadvantage because without an investor, family money, or personal wealth, they cannot possibly compete with the speeds and therefore capabilities of those who they are trying to compete with. If somebody has a better idea of how to stream videos, connect people, or provide news, they have to be overwhelmed by an uncaring and money-grubbing government before they even have a chance. You, the FCC, are now offering these people even less of a chance at achieving their goals.

What the FCC is doing is disgusting to me, as it should be to everyone who claims to endorse freedom and equality. The "American dream" has been under fire since well before I was born, and I have only seen it get more difficult since then. If the world is ever going to be unified in thought, they first have to be unified in their capacity to think. I.E. The internet should belong to everyone on earth equally (and ultimately it will). Be a part of the solution, and not the problem. Deregulate the methods by which people access information. The absolute worst thing that could happen to liberty in this day and age is an internet controlled by those with the most money.

I am having the hardest time since dial-up actually getting this comment posted. Maybe the US Government should use some of their Comcast money to buy better web service from Comcast.
