Ending net neutrality would create an uneven playing field where a handful of powerful lobbyists would control the data transmission of others and either throttle it or financially benefit from it. It would spell disaster for nonprofits, startups, and media enterprises who rely on the internet for communication and transmission of media.

The internet is still the great equalizer: a college kid getting started is on the same playing field as a media giant, and has a real shot at making it. Until (unless) you take it away. I'm all for Comcast, Time Warner and others making it big, but never because the government legislates them undue control or a monopoly.

This should be a no-brainer. It's a little shocking that it's being discussed at all.
