I think it was a mistake to classify ISPs as an information service instead of regulating it under title II as a common carrier or utility. The internet has become just as much of a necessity as telephone or electricity and should be regulated as such. The FCC needs to stop trying to dance around the latest supreme court decision and reclassify internet providers. This could allow multiple providers to share the same "Last mile" connections to households and end Comcast and Time Warners broadband monopoly in many markets. The FCC's job is to protect the public interest when it comes to the telecom industry. The proposed rules would instead grant ISPs even more power over their customers.
