How is this even a thing? You're going to let companies who clearly have a monopoly on providing internet service control what you can do online. Comcast as well as other internet providers are implementing a data cap already limiting how much data i can use each month now they want to tell me which sites get priority and fast connections. They are providers of a service, that's it. They should not be able to regulate what people do with that service to this degree. I remember when i signed up for my internet provider (Comcast) and i signed up for unlimited and they changed that and they're charging me extra if i go over. Now they want to tell me what sites i can use. How is this up for discussion?
