Allowing any legislation that restricts net neutrality is a clear violation of common sense. Any progress this legislation has made in being passed can only be attributed to talented lobbyists. For decades cable and telecommunications companies have paid politicians and colluded with competition to prevent as much progress as possible. They have been allowed to stall enhancements, through mostly duopolies, and as such have lagged behind other countries in keeping bandwidth and speeds up with other countries. So now they intend to force the biggest users to pay more, a problem they created themselves by procrastinating. If we cannot stop this legislation, then disband the FCC, because they cannot be trusted with regulation of any kind. This isn't a shade of gray, this is black and white, right and wrong, and allowing telecommunications companies free reign is wrong.
