

7521185672.txt

The kind of action you are considering here today by ending net neutrality is criminal. Another perversion of democracy under the guise of 'all is well' capitalism, this action aims to provide elite services to potential profiteers, only to hand over a clear monopoly on net services, leaving the rest of the potential in the hands of only these elite few. This is, economically speaking, very destructive. Elitism grows poverty, and a two tiered financial system could not be more indicative of the current economic status of our nation and culture today... a fast lane for the elite in which they hold all the power, and a dirt road for everyone else. To consider the idea of ending net neutrality seriously is to consider serving an amputated version of the net to the people. It has been shown in several recent studies that the political reality of the United States of America is a corporate oligarchy sold as a democracy. If this measure is passed, you will bring hard evidence to support those studies.

As a citizen, I am here to vocalize my decision as a citizen that because the internet is best served as a politically and economically neutral space, a set of laws which are congruent with our identity as a free nation are set into place, and if that requires that the corporate heads go hungry in this situation, let's all band together and hold strong against them. This proceeding has an opportunity to protect all future generations from the hijacking of net access, as long as you prevent it from happening today. There is only one road to choose.