Ending net neutrality would stifle entrepreneurship and limit competition in the entirety of the free market. The internet is an incredibly important marketing, logistics, and communication tool for any business. The only part of the market that can possibly benefit from ending net neutrality is the incredibly noncompetitive oligopoly that the cable companies currently comprise. Having the most critical industry in the digital age being outdated, overpriced, and not competitive with the rest of the world does not provide America with the infrastructure that it requires to be the leading nation in the world. Part of the American government's job is to provide America with the infrastructure required for its citizens and the country as a whole to succeed. Ending net neutrality would be a leap in precisely the wrong direction.
