How can the same government that broke up standard oil due to them having a monopoly be okay with a company/companies having a monopoly over the one area where the first amendment is embodied more than anywhere else? The internet has been and always should be the most level playing field out there, allowing the big and the small to equally make their voices heard. The best equation I can think of is giving everyone a soap box, but if you want to be heard better you have to pay more for a bigger one. Everyone should have a free soapbox to orate from, and the amount of people listening to them shouldn't be gauged to not by size of their box, but the volume of their message. Instead you are suggesting that it's OK for the ones in charge of distributing soap boxes to have a say in what is being said on them, and in a free country, with a law that I can not see as anything other than a government giving private entities the right to govern its civilians.
