

7521215868.txt

As someone whose entire job revolves around the internet, the proposals outlined by the FCC would seriously harm me. Every day I visit websites, use voice over IP communications, and other things not provided by the "big guys", large companies that would pay for prompt service.

These small, independent sites that I use and depend on would see their load times grow, their users leave, and then they would disappear. The way to prevent this is easy and is within your power; reclassify ISPs as Title II common carriers. Any "regulation" that does not include this is a farce, one which will immediately be riddled with loopholes rendering it useless, or defeated in court as you have already seen happen twice now.

Our society, economy, and even our very survival depends on a free and open internet where no one is privileged over anyone else. Restore net neutrality now! Use the Title II authority you have to make sure your regulations are fair, that they are enforceable, and that they actually do what you claim they will do; keep the internet competitive.