

Dear Members of the FCC,

I am writing to express my opinion that Net Neutrality should be preserved, and the internet should remain open and equal to everyone. The UN has declared the internet a basic human right, and allowing rich and powerful companies, like the cable providers and ISPs who are fighting so hard to create a needless "fast lane", to undermine this right by selectively allowing some information to be accessible to those who pay the highest is simply unacceptable.

The decisions that are made now, by people like you, will determine not only America's place in the future, but that of the entire human race. The internet is one of our greatest technological achievements as a species, and to deny development of new technology and new innovations that only the internet can provide, by allowing companies to filter and block access to it in demand for higher pay, is to deny the progress of humanity as a whole.

It is important that all internet traffic is treated equally, whether it comes from a high-school aged blogger, or from a media powerhouse. The true power of the internet lies in the fact that anyone can make their ideas and content available to the world, not just those with money and power.

Please do the right thing, and re-classify ISPs as Title II public utility providers, so that the internet can remain innovative, free, open, and useful to everyone.

Thank you.
