

7521225077.txt

I see you made these comments extremely formal so as to avoid having to read commenting trolls that are so replete throughout the internet. Well, I'm not one of those trolls, but I have to be absolutely frank with you. It comes down to a few basic concepts.

While philosophically speaking, it makes sense to rid the country of regulation if you are a libertarian like myself, it also does not make sense to openly offer up expansion of monopolies to humongous internet service providers like Comcast and Time Warner, which are currently trying to merge.

Do you remember back about 100 years ago, when Teddy Roosevelt was president? He was known for being something of a Trust Buster.

How about this for a change in the scene. If you are to get rid of net neutrality, which considering the current market inefficiency that is the monopoly of ISPs, then trust bust. Break Comcast and Time Warner (as well as other internet giants) up into smaller components.

The internet is probably the greatest human invention since the internal combustion engine, but the open-source, democratic nature of it could be destroyed through allowing something like this to go through.

Of course, this also serves as an opportunity for us to think a bit more on the motives behind this. Putting profit motive aside, is there a desire to keep us from communicating with one another? I am a philosopher, a scientist, an engineer, and an officer, and I have been brooding over this decision for a long time. Philosophical consistency is of primary importance when you are a philosopher, but this just does not work. Watch this video. It may give you a better understanding of the situation:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=MyME6pZ85tE>

We must get rid of secrecy in its entirety in order to have a healthy and authentic society. It is happening slowly, but eliminating net neutrality could send us in the opposite direction.