I oppose any changes to the current operational structure of the internet in its current form. Allowing corporate interests to dictate the speed, or even ability, to access information on the internet is a dangerous step. The ability of the internet to be open to all access without discrimination allows for the free exchange of ideas, information and culture which could otherwise not happen. Allowing corporations to implement internet "fast lanes" for certain, paying parties while other parties who may not be able to afford such luxuries infringes on not only the spirit of the internet's history and culture of a free-exchange of ideas, but also inhibits the marketplace of goods and services which the internet is a unique and integral conduit.

Changing the current "neutrality" of the internet is an affront to free market economics, free speech and information exchange.
