Please do not allow people to talk on their phones while in flight. I can't imagine anything more miserable than being forced to attend someone's three hour business meeting or listen to someone fight with her boyfriend.

In addition, as I'm sure you've noticed, some people don't seem to get the concept of phones and shout as if their voice must reach the person on the other end without assistance, amplifiers and microphones. When a person cannot hear the person on the other end -- which may be a problem over the roar of engines -- they raise their voice to compensate.

In most places where conversations occur, bystanders can move away from the caller -- that's not the case when in flight.

Please squash this idea once and for all time. Thank you.
