The idea of permitting the bloated monopolies (which the cable companies are for the most part) to decide which information and programming will be in the fast lane on cable based on financial kickbacks has the foul smell of extortion. Shame on the FCC even to consider this disservice to the the public interest. Needless to say the logical result of eliminating network neutrality will be big money and big established companies squeezing out the innovative and new and further concentrating money and influence in those that have the deep pocket.
