

7521269487.txt

There is nothing more heinous and disheartening than watching human beings design the mechanisms attached to the guillotine. Why have we decided that corporations are our saving grace? We have afforded them every protection known to (upper-middle class, (what even is that?) white, heterosexual, employed, American) man so that they may enjoy limitless freedom with our wallets, rivers, mountains, television, highways, grocery stores, hospitals, radio, etc. Essentially what we have done is make it impossible to sign up for a reality other than one that conveniently makes money for those people who have the ability to dictate what money is worth and what it can bring you (no way, that can't be right). And for what? Does anyone feel like their money is being put to good use? If so, then theres a School of America I'd like you to investigate and about a dozen or so armed conflicts around the world that you should volunteer to be involved in. The point is this, we can continue to allow companies like Comcast, Bank of America, Northrop Grumman, the Trumps, Unilever (which might own several of these companies... I don't know) to continue to provide consumers with horrible service, pay their workers nil, rake in billions of dollars, declare their revenue overseas, reinvest in their satellite companies and thereafter sponsor conflicts and direct popular opinion into the regions of the world that can provide them with the resources necessary for them to conduct business; or we can do something about it. This public forum will do ABSOLUTELY NOTHING. Regulations on the internet have already begun, there is no stopping them. It's done, the only thing they need now is to cover their tracks, which is what the bill is all about. So yeah, my rant is over. I doubt anyone worth mentioning will even read this or give a shit about what a 18-25 year old African-American male has to say (surprise!) but here it is in a nutshell. Power doesn't change on its own, you have to make it.