

7521287399.txt

I support an internet that is free of corporate greed and strangleholds. As it currently stands, the internet by itself does not lend itself better to big business or private websites. It's a frontier where both sides of the equation can be successful. This is an aspect that should not be lost in biased regulations.

And on another note, there are more important things for big telecommunications to pursue. Instead of trying to milk more money out of the infrastructure they already have, these companies should be expanding the effective range and reach of the internet. It's 2014, wi-fi shouldn't be a big city thing alone. This is neither here nor there, but don't you think that random guy in the Rocky Mountains would appreciate fast, reliable internet as well?