Everything. It's a globally accessible information resource. I think few of us are surprised when we hear a country like China or Iran "censor" the Web and allow their citizens access only to state-approved content. The same happening in the United States or any democratic, upstanding country is, needless to say, horrifying. Removing the FCC's Open Internet policies and allowing big business to regulate access to Internet content as they see fit puts us on the road to a system in which corporate interests determine selectively what data to make available, and we'll end up not much better off than a country with state-sanctioned content restrictions. Please do not let this happen.
