

7521302044.txt

I believe the proposed changes for net neutrality not only gut what the idea originally stood for, but instead empower ISPs to put a stranglehold on an already anemic and oligopolistic market. It is my belief that the FCC and other government agencies should push to have ISPs (cable, dsl, and wireless providers alike) classified as "Title II" common carriers, and force them to treat all data equally. I don't think anyone should be able to prioritize one user's data over another because of agreements made between big players. The reason the internet has flourished as much as it has is due simply to the fact that it's always been a level playing field for everyone involved.