

7521311417.txt

The Internet is a mass communications device using the same basic principles (signals over cable) as our telephones of the past. It is the modern equivalent of the telephone and the same rules of privacy, freedom of speech, and equality of service should apply. We paid for connection time only, not who we spoke to or how fast we spoke. Those principles of service should be carried forward.