

7521312787.txt

"Competitive bidding" within internet appears to be more of a scheme to help cable monopolies destroy something that is not broken. Instead, how about we keep net neutrality, instead of destroying the something that isn't broken.

While we are at it, where is the regulation on these monopolies? Why is it that I have a choice of Time Warner and Time Warner for my internet? Why is it that I pay increasingly higher prices, have to now rent a modem that is 10 year old technology, and get slower speeds than Estonia or Korea?

Maybe the FCC could actually prove that it is not the puppet of corporations, despite its ex-lobbyist management.