

Does anybody honestly believe that the cable and wireless industries are trying to abort a free and open internet for any reason other than raising their own profits to maximum cockbag levels? There is no defensible reason to suggest that abolishing network neutrality will do anything but rob consumers of choice and further drive up the cost of getting online without any benefit to the consumer whatsoever.

Americans already pay twice as much as Korea for internet, but on average, their internet connections are 8000% faster than what is available in the US. "America's TV and internet providers: You won't like it, and there are no other options!"
