There's no real comments here to make. The thievery in this proposal is obvious, and the lies are as well. These comments are more a meter-stick by which the FCC is trying to gauge national interest. If there is low interest, then the lobbying dollars will carry the day, and another portion of our world will become enslaved to the top dollar; to the detriment of the many and the benefit of the few.

This is incredibly obvious, so there's no comments to make. Just a simple statement that I, as anyone who has no ulterior motive would agree, am able to understand that creating a multi-tier system will significantly impact the economics that make the Internet powerful - which is precisely why those who stand to benefit have spent millions lobbying for such laws. Nobody spends 20 million dollars in favors without a goal in mind, and that goal very rarely benefits the many - or it would already be a law.
