

7521330660.txt

The FCC must keep Net Neutrality. Allowing cable providers to charge various prices to select demanders of access to the internet is unconscionable. Failing to uphold net neutrality will result in higher prices among all users within the system and slow down the average speed and access available to the public. The government needs to focus on plans that encourage faster speeds and easier access to the internet, not uphold regional monopolies and restricting access and speed through price hikes.