

7521334787.txt

Internet Neutrality is a must for the modern world. Our future depends on the ability to communicate quickly and efficiently and an open internet free of subsidization is where we need to head. If the ISPs like Comcast had their way, they would treat the internet much like they would their cable TV services. Pay $59.99/month for a core of 30 predetermined websites, $70 for the premium 100 website package which includes streaming services and online gaming server access. They would prioritize bandwidth to specific sites in that package that are willing to pay them a fee to get the faster speed to their users. This would literally return us back to the days before the internet was even a twinkle in Tim Berners-Lee's eye.

I agree with Frank La Rue's report to the UN in 2011 that states, to paraphrase, access to the internet without unreasonable restrictions is a basic human right. Attacking an open and unrestricted internet is attacking our freedom of speech, our freedom of expression, and our right as human beings to access knowledge be it mundane and superficial or in depth and significant to what we are doing at the time we need it.

By allowing ISPs to charge premiums for service providers, such as Netflix, to enable faster speeds and/or pipelines then they will be allowed to attack the open and unrestricted internet. It will set the precedent that will allow them to monopolize and restrict the internet as they see fit.

Please, for the sake of our future and for the sake of the livelihoods of people who work for internet based companies, do not allow ISPs to prioritize bandwidth in this manner. The internet should be unrestricted, open, and fair to any and all users regardless of if they are a large corporation or a single person. No one service or individual should be given preferential treatment over the internet regardless if they are willing to pay more.