

7521346599.txt

Cable companies are claiming net neutrality is infringing on their freedom of speech, but what happens to the freedom of speech for customers when their small website loads at 1/100th the speed it used to because they can't afford to pay verizon/comcast's fast lane fee? Does this not count as an infringement on an individual's freedom of speech?