

7521347063.txt

As someone who has essentially grown up with a free internet, I have to say that eliminating net neutrality would be fundamentally wrong. Since it's surge to popularity, the internet has always been the great equalizer, a place where small start-ups of all kinds could flourish alongside larger operations. Cable company wallets are what truly benefit from net neutrality restrictions. The costs far outweigh the benefits in regard to this issue, and I am strongly oppose ending net neutrality.