

7521355796.txt

Dear FCC,

I'd like to express my discontent with the advancement of proceedings against net neutrality. Corporations already have enough power, and the internet is one venue left where companies can compete on somewhat equal footing. Moreover, the amazing freedom associated with the internet is something that has benefitted society in myriad ways; please don't take this away. The only 'people' benefitting from the knock-down of net neutrality are cable companies, who should be looking for new ways to please their customers instead of charging higher and higher rates for internet-only service to make up for the disinterest in regular cable. Let the people drive internet usage; not the cable companies.

Thanks for listening,
Rebecca Tarvin
Austin, TX, USA