Dear FCC,

I am a frequent user of the internet. Not anyone particular site or genre of sites, nor am I particularly wealthy. Only through the neutrality of the internet am I able to not just entertain myself - as that is not the reason for internet - but to learn for the sake of my classes that I might actually have a reasonable chance to pass, seeing as I lack other resources or abilities that allow me to connect with teachers and information databases at even a fraction of the capacity currently available to me. Considering I'm too young to easily reach areas where I could avail myself to these resources, lack the wealth to request such resources more easily, and live in an area where I would otherwise be cut off from the only feasible way to communicate with family, friends, and teachers, I'm afraid I have no other course of action but to make my voice heard in protest of your desire to end net neutrality.
